The hybrid-enterprise ladder.

It does not count your agents; it measures what you can still do with what you have delegated. Five stages, and the two states off to the side.

STAGE	IN ONE SENTENCE	THE TELLTALE SIGN
0 — Spectator	"AI is something to keep an eye on, not a player: nothing is delegated, nothing is decided."	"An executive committee that talks about it without ever deciding."
1 — Equipped	"Assistants everywhere, no mandate: everyone delegates under the radar—and the time saved evaporates."	"A record adoption rate and a P&L that doesn't move."
2 — Delegating	"Tasks made explicit and delegated under mandate to agents in understudy mode; sponsors decide case by case, and the savings stay local."	"Agents that work; an intelligence bill nobody knows how to read."
3 — Piloted	"Entire processes, one page per agent; leadership makes the trade-offs with instruments, and the dividend is decided."	"For every agent, you can say who stops it and why."
4 — Hybrid	"The human-agent allocation is governed as an asset; humans make the trade-offs by design, and the dividend is redeployed."	"Your juniors are still learning; your customers' agents find you easy to read."
Off to the side — Alienated	"Too much, too fast, with no grid and no page: the vendor and the contract make the decisions, and the dividend is captured by others."	"An agent's decision that no one can explain or take over anymore."
Off to the side — Blind	"A charter, an official refusal—and, underneath, daily use of public AI tools nobody has inventoried: delegation exists, but without the company's knowledge."	"A policy, no inventory; and the executive who signed it has ChatGPT on their phone."

Be honest about where you stand, function by function. Most companies have one foot at stage 1, a team at stage 2—and already one agent off to the side.

Your reading

FUNCTION	STAGE TODAY	SIGN OBSERVED	IN SIX MONTHS